

EDITORIAL

In September the International Association of Law Libraries' meeting took place in Vienna and we are pleased to have permission to publish an article that follows on from the Internet theme of the last issue. This is a paper given by Marylin Raisch on "International Law Resources on the Internet" followed by a 'Webography' of international law sites. In other contributions there is a review article on E Law, the electronic journal from Murdoch University, and Richard Griffiths continues the saga of the Legislative Instruments Act 1995.

With this December issue the 3 years' production of Australian Law Librarian in the ACT comes to an end. It has been an exciting time and a lot of hard work but the whole Committee will benefit from the experience. I would like to thank everyone who has been connected with the publication, not only the Committee and the wonderful columnists on whom we have relied, but also Mariana Rollgejser who has done the graphic design, Goanna Print, whose excellent colour reproductions have been commended both locally and overseas, and the Polk mailing house. They have all contributed in vital ways.

We in the ACT are handing responsibility for Australian Law Librarian over to the new committee in South Australia. The new editor will be Barbara Coat of the Australian Securities Commission. Please refer to the Spotlight column for a list of the new committee and columnists. We wish them luck and stand ready to assist if required. Several of our columnists will continue writing for the journal and I am pleased to be keeping in touch with Australian Law Librarian through Pacific News.

Looking back over the period 1993-1995, it has been a little disappointing to me to find that, considering our numbers, relatively few law librarians are prepared to contribute articles. I have previously encouraged new writers in this column to offer to write something for Australian Law Librarian because everyone has something of interest to contribute. I urge you all again to think about it and to support the new committee as much as possible. It is not an easy task to combine the production of the journal with our everyday work but the task is made easier by a regular flow of contributions. At the same time there is a core of people who have contributed several times in the last three years and I thank them especially for their willingness to help.

On behalf of the Committee may I wish everyone a happy Christmas and a wonderful year in 1996.

JACQUELINE ELLIOTT - EDITOR

Goodbye from Committee members: Sue Milne, Christine Hawke, Jacqueline Elliott and Julia Butler
[Photograph taken by Leonie Hale, IBC Information Services]