

EDITORIAL

The Auckland University Law Review represents the contribution of the Auckland University Law Students' Society to the wider community. It represents the merging of intellectual rigour with an attempt to provide clear answers and pragmatic solutions. The Law Review has established itself as a successful forum for this onerous undertaking, drawing on a legacy of twenty-five years of student editorial experience.

The 1992 edition of the Law Review has been expanded to reflect the recent growth in research and seminar programmes within the Law School, and the ever-increasing quality of student research and writing. 1992 also marks the Law Review's first venture into desktop publishing; we gratefully acknowledge the enormous contribution of our Publication Editors and sub-editorial team in ensuring the success of this venture. Our thanks are extended to the Library and Faculty staff of the Law School, and in particular to Professor Bill Hodge and Rosemary Tobin for their continued willing assistance and guidance – always rendered discreetly and received most gratefully.

The Law Review attempts to deal with some of the more notable recent developments in the law, both the positive and, arguably, the questionable. We are grateful to the authors who have contributed and cooperated so willingly in the publication process. Our combined efforts will be amply rewarded if the ideas presented promote discussion and contribute to the future direction of law-making in New Zealand.
