

Chapter 3

Thomas McCawley v The King

*Nicholas Aroney

As to my own little matter, the Court reserved its decision . . . I have no doubt that the decision will be adverse – the atmosphere of hostility, political, professional, and personal, certainly favours such a result.

Thomas McCawley to Henry Bourne Higgins,
2 February 1918¹

Introduction

Of the many cases that have dealt with the constitutional foundations of the Australian States, *Thomas McCawley v The King*² is possibly the most significant, and certainly the most fundamental. In its day, the case was also one of the most controversial.

The case concerned the appointment of Thomas McCawley as President of the Queensland Court of Industrial Arbitration in early 1917 and his appointment as a Judge of the Queensland Supreme Court later that year. The appointments were contested because the statute under which they were made, the Industrial Arbitration Act 1916 (Qld), was in certain respects inconsistent with the Constitution Act 1867 (Qld), itself a statute enacted by the Queensland Parliament.

The constitutional significance of the case derived from the critical issue that it addressed, which was whether the Constitution Act is to be

* I wish to thank Professor George Winterton and the Sesquicentenary of Responsible Government Trust established by the New South Wales Government for providing funding to support this project. Thanks are also due to Jonathan Fulcher, Jon Crowe, Nick James, Suri Ratnapala, Jim Allan, Reid Mortensen and Michael White.

1 Papers of Henry Bourne Higgins, MS1057, National Library of Australia.

2 McCawley v The King [1920] AC 691; (1920) 28 CLR 106 (“McCawley”).

This is a preview. Not all pages are shown.