

About the Authors

Philip Bohle is Professor of Work and Health in the Ageing, Work and Health Research Unit, Faculty of Health Sciences, University of Sydney. Philip has published extensively on occupational health and aspects of sustainable work, particularly the relationships between psychosocial factors, work organisation and health. His current projects concern working hours, work-life balance and health; the health and safety effects of precarious work; health and safety in home care work; age, work ability and health; and the impact of workplace death on families.

Dick Bryan is Professor of Political Economy at the University of Sydney. He researches the impact of financial innovation on class relations and has co-written (with Michael Rafferty) Capitalism with Derivatives: A Political Economy of Financial Derivatives, Capital and Class (Palgrave Macmillan, 2006) and articles published in the journals of Economy and Society, Socialist Register and Historical Materialism. In particular, his research focuses on the incorporation of households into the calculation logic of finance.

Iain Campbell is a Senior Research Fellow at the Centre for Applied Social Research (CASR), RMIT University, working on research projects to do with labour restructuring, precarious work, temporary migrant labour, working-time patterns and trade union strategies, both in Australia and internationally. His doctoral research in geography at the University of Melbourne was on casual work and casualisation in Australia. He is co-author of Fragmented Futures: New Challenges in Working Life (Federation Press, 2003) and co-editor of Gender and the Contours of Precarious Employment (Routledge, 2009).

Sara Charlesworth is a Professor and an Australian Research Council Future Fellow at the School of Management, RMIT University. Her main area of research is gender (in)equality in employment. Sara is currently working on two ARC funded projects – one examining the impact of regulatory strategies on gender inequality drawing on the International Labour Organization's Decent Work agenda and the other focusing on ways in which decent work for frontline care workers is linked with the quality of care services.

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

Stephen J Frenkel is Professor of Organization and Employment Relations in the Australian School of Business at the University of New South Wales. Stephen has authored 60 journal articles and edited or authored 10 books. He is an editorial member of several journals including Industrial and Labor Relations Review, Human Relations, Organization Studies, and the International Journal of Human Resource Management. His current research interest is in the comparative sociology of work with particular reference to China.

Angela Knox is an Associate Professor of Work and Organisational Studies at the University of Sydney. Her research focuses on the service sector and includes precarious and flexible forms of employment, work-life balance and job quality. She has published in Gender, Work and Organisation, the Human Resource Management Journal, the International Journal of Human Resource Management and Work, Employment and Society. She is also an Associate Board Member of Work, Employment and Society.

Jill Murray has a D Phil in Law from Oxford University, as well as degrees in Arts and Industrial Relations from the University of Melbourne. She has published extensively on Australian, international and European Union employment law, with a particular focus on the regulation of working time. In addition to her academic publications, she has provided consultation and research services to institutions including the International Labour Organization, the European Union, the United Nations and the Australian Council of Trade Unions.

Barbara Pocock is an Adjunct Professor at the University of South Australia. She was the Director of the Centre for Work + Life from 2006 to 2014, researching the effects of work on Australians and their workplaces, households, and communities in which they live. Barbara has worked in many jobs – in governments, banks, shearing sheds, universities, advising politicians and as a mother. Widely published, her latest book, written with Philippa Williams and Natalie Skinner, is called Time Bomb: Work, Rest and Play in Australia Today (NewSouth Books, 2012).

Michael Quinlan is a Professor in the School of Organisation and Management at the University of New South Wales and Honorary Professor in the Faculty of Health Sciences, University of Sydney. He also holds an adjunct post at Middlesex University. He has published widely on work health and safety and changes to work arrangements, including his most recent co-authored books, Regulating Work Risks (Edward Elgar, 2011) and Beyond Employment (Federation Press, 2012). His research focuses particularly on the effect of precarious employment on health and social protection regimes.

Michael Rafferty is an Australian Research Council Future Fellow at the University of Sydney. He researches the impact of financial innovation on class relations and has co-written (with Dick Bryan) Capitalism with Derivatives: A Political Economy of Financial Derivatives, Capital and Class (Palgrave Macmillan, 2006) and articles published in the journals of Economy and Society, Socialist Register and Historical Materialism. His research also focuses on pension funds and the international mobility of their investment.

Andrew Stewart is the John Bray Professor of Law at the University of Adelaide and a consultant to the law firm Piper Alderman. He is also President of the Australian Labour Law Association and editor of the Australian Journal of Labour Law. He helped to advise the federal government on the Fair Work legislation and has worked with Rosemary Owens on Australia's first major report on unpaid work experience, commissioned by the Fair Work Ombudsman. Andrew's publications include Creighton and Stewart's Labour Law (Federation Press, 2010) and Stewart's Guide to Employment Law (Federation Press, 2015).

Chris Warhurst is Professor and Director of the Institute for Employment Research at the University of Warwick in the United Kingdom. He was previously Professor of Work and Organisational Studies at Sydney University Business School. Over 2008-2010 he was co-editor of the British Sociological Association journal Work, Employment and Society and co-editor of a number of books including Are Bad Jobs Inevitable? (Palgrave, 2012). He has been an expert adviser to the United Kingdom, Scottish and Australian governments and is currently an International Expert Adviser to the OECD.

Sally Weller is an economic geographer and is currently an Australian Research Council Future Fellow in the School of Geography and Environmental Science at Monash University. Her research centres on developing a spatialised understanding of the changing structure of the Australian economy, with particular emphasis on associated labour market changes. She has conducted major studies of labour market change in the clothing and textiles sector, the aviation sector, the farming sector and, most recently, the energy sector and its anticipated low-emissions transformation.

Sally Wright is a Senior Research Fellow at the Institute for Employment Research at the University of Warwick in the United Kingdom. Her current research interests include job quality, minimum wages and the low-paid, workplace restructuring, gender pay equity and work-life balance. For Eurofound, an agency of the European Commission, she is currently investigating job quality in Australia. She is also developing an index of job quality in Australia as part of her doctoral study at Warwick.

Acknowledgments

This book was written in association with an expert conference on job quality in Australia, organised and funded by the University of Sydney Business School. We would like to thank Professor David Grant and his team in the Business School for their support for the conference and the Business School's continuing support for the Job Quality Research Group, particularly Professor Elizabeth Cowley. Many of the conference participants have contributed to this book. However, the editors would like to thank all of the participants for their tremendous enthusiasm and commitment to improving understanding of job quality and raising the profile of job quality in Australia. Similarly, the support and assistance provided by Chris Holt, Trisha Valliappan, Elizabeth Browne and Ann Cunningham at The Federation Press have been invaluable and greatly appreciated. Our thanks also extend to Viji Venkataramani who provided constant editorial support and assistance, while sacrificing many weekends in the process! Finally, thanks to Professor Arne L Kalleberg for both his wonderful contribution to the expert conference as rapporteur and his insightful Foreword to this book.