

organisation of a continuing judicial education (CJE) scheme. The program of CJE that the JCNSW has devised is a matrix of "content" - substantive law, procedure, management and administration, judicial skills and ethics - and "pitch" - induction, orientation, updating, exchanging experience, specialisation and refresher - and so the CJE can accurately meet the educational needs of the particular class of judicial officer.

The JCNSW provides conferences and workshops and publishes the Judicial Officers Bulletin and bench books, and has developed an extensive orientation program for new magistrates.

Towards a charter of continuing judicial education - the New South Wales experience

The policy of the Judicial Commission of NSW (JCNSW) is to place the control of continuing judicial education (CJE) in the hands of the judges and magistrates. The CJE program of the JCNSW began in 1988 with the introduction of a range of conferences and publications for judicial officers, including an induction program for newly appointed magistrates, and the monthly publication of the Judicial Officers Bulletin, and a number of bench books. Under the direction of the Local Court all magistrates have five days dispensation from sitting to accommodate a three day annual conference and two one day seminar workshops.

The JCNSW has recently completed a comprehensive analysis to determine directions for the future development of CJE. The analysis combined judicial interviews, a judicial survey, a review of judicial management, observations of the judicial function and an analysis of the resources available to the judges for CJE.

The philosophy behind the JCNSW's CJE program is to enhance the quality of justice through the provision of educational services to judges and magistrates, specifically aimed at assisting judges in the performance of their duties. The principles used in the education of professional and adults are adopted by the JCNSW in its CJE programs.

LEGAL EDUCATION GENERALLY

Legal education and professional training in Canada

C MacMillan

SPTL Reporter, 8, Spring 1994, p 8

Outlines the history of legal education in Canada. Law is a postgraduate degree. Admission is based on a good first degree and a good score in the Law School Admission Test. Discusses the syllabuses of law schools. The author goes on to describe the professional training elements of articles and bar admission courses.

The strengths of Canadian legal education are the requirement of a first degree, the high admission standards and the legal training which provides a reasonable level of practical skills. Its principal weakness is that the system is long and expensive.

Legal education for social change

M Gomez

Law & Society Trust, Colombo, Sri Lanka, 1993, 110pp

Questions relating to legal education and law reform have often been addressed separately in the Sri Lankan context. This monograph looks at the question of legal education against the wider backdrop of Sri Lanka's inherited legal system, legal culture and legal traditions. It argues that legal education should promote social transformation. It calls for the training of professionals who are committed to fundamental values of democracy and human rights. The author calls upon law schools and universities to be actively involved in public and social life. Questions related to language are also looked at. Sri Lanka is one of the few jurisdictions in the world where law is taught in three languages. This has affected in a very fundamental manner the content and methods of legal education.

Chapters deal with themes such as the emergence of the modern legal profession, democratisation, curriculum development, teaching methodologies, the language of the courts and of the law, bilingualism, and the role of the law school.

The history of New Zealand legal education: a study in ambivalence

P Spiller

4 Legal Educ Rev, 2, 1993, pp 223-254

Legal education in New Zealand (NZ) has mirrored legal education in England. NZ lawyers clung to the English notion that immersion in practice was the only path for those aspiring to be lawyers. Before the establishment of universities offering law as a discipline, entry to the NZ profession was on the assumption that the candidate was qualified elsewhere, particularly in the United
