

Report, or Legal Education and Professional Development - An Educational Continuum. The ten chapters of the report examine the nature of the changing legal profession, trends in law school curriculum, the licensing process, transitional education and the range of programs available for continuing legal education. The Task Force also included an 88 page Statement of Skills and Values that they felt lawyers need to possess. The Task Force concluded that law school curriculum was inadequate in preparing law students for legal practice and gives various recommendations as to how this deficiency can be remedied at pre-law school, law school and graduate levels.

The Common Law of Europe and the future of legal education

Book review by H G Schermers
30 Comm Mkt L Rev, 4, p 861

The book is the report of a conference held in Maastricht to celebrate the 10th anniversary of the law faculty there. It contains 45 contributions by authors on either the common law of Europe, or on future legal education, or on both. The purpose of the conference was to investigate whether it would be recommendable to set up a European Law School serving all European States. The advantages and disadvantages of this were considered, along with recognition and discussion of the fact that this would require a degree of uniform European law.

A fresh look at lawyers' education

R MacCrate
27 U Rich L Rev, p 21

The author was the Chair on the American Bar Association Task Force on Law Schools and the Profession: Narrowing the Gap. This article discusses the contents of the report put out by the Task Force entitled Legal Education and Professional Development - An Educational Continuum. The Task Force commenced with a study of the legal profession and its requirements. From this study, they then developed a comprehensive statement of the essential skills and values that a competent and responsible lawyer should possess and made recommendations as to how these skills could be obtained, for example, by issuing the statement to law students who could then monitor and develop these skills themselves. Finally the Task Force critically examined the entire process and made recommendations to prospective lawyers, law schools, to the organised bar and other providers of continuing legal education, and to licensing authorities as to how they could contribute to the design of more effective patterns of education and development.

Storytelling: a different voice for legal education

S C McKenzie
41 U Kan L Rev, 1992, p 251

The role of the lawyer as a storyteller is explored. That is, lawyers tell two different stories in court and the judge then decides which is the correct one. The author explores the uses of storytelling by lawyers and the failure of legal education to recognise this role. Recommendations for reforms for legal education to incorporate this role are made. These include smaller classes, increased opportunities for student writing, clinical courses, and focussing classroom discussion on the lawyer's role as a problem solver.

Law Society's Research Conference on legal education

9 Socio-Legal Newsletter, Summer 1993, p 8

The English Law Society's Research and Policy Planning Unit's annual conference focussed on legal education. Topics dealt with included legal skills, the CPE course, training for management, access to legal education, training for advocacy, and evaluating student performance. A copy of the conference proceedings can be obtained from Gerry Chambers in RPPU (071 320 5892).

LEGAL ETHICS

Ethical integrity in the legal profession: survey results regarding law students' veracity on resumes and recommendations for enhancing legal ethics outside the classroom

N Millich
24 Ariz St L J, p 1181

To enhance ethical integrity in the legal profession, courses in professional responsibility have been introduced at law schools and mandatory ethical requirements have been promulgated by the American Bar Association. The author describes recent surveys which reveal an increase in ethical problems faced by lawyers. She also reports the results of two nationwide surveys she conducted of 167 law schools. These surveys suggest that there may be similar problems with the ethical integrity of law students. This data suggests that the courses and the ABA regulations are not enough and that ethical training should begin as early as possible. The author concludes with recommendations for instilling legal ethics outside the classroom by utilising the hiring and placement process.

Puncturing the myth of the moral intractability of law students: the suggestiveness of the work of psychologist Lawrence Kohlberg for ethical training in legal education

E M Abramson
7 Notre Dame J L Ethics & Pub Pol'y, 1993, p 223

The author considers at length the theories, and empirical evidence in support, of Lawrence Kohlberg. Kohlberg demonstrates that there is an objective and universal dimension to moral structures and moral reasoning, that an individual's moral sensibilities develop constantly and that particular teaching methods can enhance this development. On this basis, the author contends that legal ethics should be more widely taught to law students. He details several scenarios where a lawyer is faced with an ethical dilemma and concludes by suggesting that law schools are being lax in not using some of the methods suggested by Kohlberg to enhance the moral development of law students and to develop their sense of duty and obligation away from the selfish interests of their clients and themselves and towards more social concerns and a deeper sense of justice.

Ethical integrity in the legal profession: survey results regarding law students' veracity on resumes and recommendations for enhancing legal ethics outside the classroom

N Millich
24 Ariz St L J, p 1181

Recently, to enhance ethical integrity in the legal profession, courses in professional responsibility have been incorporated into law school curricula and become mandatory requirements of the American Bar Association. The author describes several recent surveys which examined whether these changes have had any effect on the ethical integrity of students and practitioners and which reveal that in fact attorneys are experiencing an increase in ethical problems. She further reports on two nationwide surveys conducted of 167 accredited law schools. Analysis of these
